post-season series a year ago, is not making the showing it did then. The main reason why Treasury is not making such a record this season is because it is not getting as good pitching. In 1914 Downey, the big lefthander, was about as clever as any other hurler in the amateur circuits, and was, perhaps, superior to the others: he worked in few contests in which he failed to hold the opposition to a minimum number of hits, and when errors were made he could generally tighten up sufficiently to strike out or in some manner dispose of a batter or two easily enough to pull his club out of the hole. While Bell and Croson have been doing creditably, it is no reflection on their work to say that they are hardly hurling as well as Downey did in 1914.

About the only amateur leaves game. He held down an in-field position yesterday, though his regular place is in the outfield.

Joe Leverton, who used to play amateur ball regularly, is almost a mystery as far as hitting is concerned. Yesterday he performed at third base for the Outlanders, and he got two clean drives over second, and hit another ball hard enough to get a hit, but it went right at one of the infielders. Last year in the Machinists in Manger Le Club of the Machinists in
